Summary: Tesla is scheduled to reveal its highly anticipated robotaxi on Oct. 10 at an event in Los Angeles, California, and investors appear to be waiting until then before making any big Tesla stock bets. While most of the details are still under wraps, Chief Executive Elon Musk is setting sky high expectations for the event. Musk posted to X on Sept. 11 that in his opinion the robotaxi reveal will be the most significant moment for Tesla since the EV company unveiled the Model 3 nearly nine years ago.

Summary: Barclays has raised its forecast for Tesla's (TSLA) third-quarter deliveries to 470,000 vehicles, significantly above Wall Street's prediction of 461,000. This bullish outlook is driving Tesla's stock higher. Barclays Senior Equity Research Analyst Dan Levy joins Morning Brief to discuss his projections. Levy identifies "two streams" currently propelling Tesla stock: fundamentals and "the excitement over the EV, AI narrative." He notes that Tesla has recently gained "stability on fundamentals," contributing to his optimistic third-quarter delivery outlook. Additionally, the EV, AI narrative is gaining momentum as the October 10th robotaxi event approaches. However, Levy expresses one concern: Tesla's high valuation. "There is a valuation issue here that I think is making some people uncomfortable. That's what underpins our Equal weight rating," he explains. "We think about things like autonomous [driving], which is gonna be the center of robotaxi day. There's a very long timeframe of really, truly monetizing the value of this."
